OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY OFFERS INTERNATIONAL UNDERGRADUATE SCHOLARSHIPS

Established in 1870, The Ohio State University is a world-class research university located in Columbus, Ohio, the state's capital and largest city. Ohio State has attained national and international distinction in education and research and is ranked among the top 20 public universities in the United States (U.S. News and World Report). Students benefit from a scholarly environment in which research inspires and informs teaching.

Ohio State offers more than 160 majors (from liberal arts to biological sciences), 475 areas of specialization, 800 student organizations, and co-ops/internships in every field. Opportunities in and out of the classroom help students network, gain experience, and strengthen their preparation for employment or graduate school.

The institution is among the top 10 public research universities in the United States based on total research expenditures. The university's research labs, expert faculty, and ties to industry result in a high ranking for Ohio State's programs in the biological, medical, and physical sciences, as well as in technology and engineering.

Ohio State is "home" to about 1,600 international scholars and nearly 4,000 international students from 80 countries.

International House

International House is a multicultural living and learning center for American and international students. In addition to traditional classroom work, students participate in internships and cooperative education programs that develop professionalism and prepare them for careers. They gain personal and career development experience through research, residence hall experiences, student government leadership positions, and an array of community service opportunities. The strength of the university continues to be its focus on the student experience. Historically defined as the merging of academic and student life, this strength is fostered by attentive and dedicated faculty and staff members. This student-centered attitude is embodied in the relationships among students and their faculty and staff mentors.

US UNIVERSITIES STILL ACCEPTING LATE APPLICATIONS FROM INTERNATIONAL STUDENTS

If you have students who are desperate to make a late round of applications, here's the annual survey from NACAC (the National Association of College Admissions Counselors) listing dozens of excellent schools that still have places available. No guarantees of international financial aid, but no harm in asking.

www.nacacnet.org/PublicationsResources/Research/SpaceAvailabilitySurvey/Pages/SpaceSurveyResults.aspx

Download the list and keep it because it will disappear from this site within two weeks.

The following story appears in the New York Times' excellent college admissions blog, The Choice, on the available places:

Here is an even more interesting story on yields and the potential for taking waitlisted students. It is really helpful for understanding how yields and waitlists work:

THE CHALLENGES FACED BY COLLEGES USING SOCIAL MEDIA TO RECRUIT STUDENTS

Higher education traffics in reputations. To thrive as an institution means keeping up with competitors while setting yourself apart. But as good as colleges have become at building brands, the game is shifting to social media, where there is perpetual motion and little control.

As technology evolves, colleges feel pressure to be present in every possible way. A suite of student blogs, now common, probably falls short. So Assumption College's Web site features a stream of students' Twitter-style one-liners, constantly refreshed. To display dynamic images, the University of New Mexico maintains a Flickr pool, fed by photos from users' linked accounts. Dozens of colleges have started dispatching updates on Twitter, and by last month two-thirds of institutions had official Facebook pages, according to Brad J. Ward, co-founder of the Web-based-marketing firm BlueFuego.

Staying current isn't the only challenge. With social media, anyone can chime in. Colleges that were once occupied with staying on message are warily opening up to the e-masses—and trying to get used to that. "You don't own the conversation anymore," Mr. Ward tells clients. "You have to let go."

With blogs, Twitter, and Facebook, some colleges are taking aim at specific audiences, under banners like admissions, alumni, and athletics. They can then draw content from each stream for a more-general site or feed. To generate some of that content, colleges are "crowdsourcing," or farming out production to a large group. The McCombs School of Business at the University of Texas at Austin pulled off a particularly successful video contest; now DePaul University is doing the same.

Experimentation is tempting, if not always prudent. "There's so much that you can do that it gets overwhelming," says Rachel Reuben, director of Web communication and strategic projects at New Paltz. "You should pick one or two tools, tops, and really focus on them."

CHICAGO SCHOOL OF PROFESSIONAL PSYCHOLOGY ANNOUNCES NEW PH.D. IN INTERNATIONAL PSYCHOLOGY

Recognizing a need for more trained professionals to understand and work with global challenges such as socio-cultural contexts, conflict, poverty, and natural disasters, The Chicago School of Professional Psychology is chartering the nation's first Ph.D. in International Psychology.

Designed for working professionals, the post-master's doctoral degree will leverage The Chicago School's 30-year pedigree of psychology training rooted in diversity and multicultural studies. According to the program's architects, this academic foundation will be critical for individuals seeking to work in the international arena.

"There is a need for understanding, appreciation, and respect for culturally sensitive psychology practice globally. The Ph.D. program is designed to address broad competencies and skills rather than narrow foci on specific sub-disciplines," said Dr. Robert Clark, the program's chair.

The new non-licensure Ph.D. is the latest in a series of international-themed initiatives developed by The Chicago School to further advance the understanding and practice of psychology worldwide. TCS became home to the Central Office of the International School Psychology Association last fall, has a China Office in Shanghai, and has students and faculty engaged in projects in Sri Lanka, Germany, Israel and the West Bank, and the United Nations.
